

World Championships

At the first World Championships there was only a men's competition. However, there was no rule that women are excluded and so Madge Syers took part in the competition in 1902 and she even won the silver medal. The international federation International Skating Union (ISU) introduced a separate competition for ladies in 1906.

In the early years the judges have been invited by the host country and were therefore often only locals. After a judge controversy at the Ladies' competition in 1927 this was changed. From 1928 onwards only one judge per country was admitted.

In 1960, the ISU limited the number of participants of a nation per competition to three.

In 1991, the compulsory figures, in which the individual athletes had to run special patterns and figures in front of the judges as possible accurately, were abolished. The 6.0 scoring system, which was the scoring basis most of the time, used until 2004. From 2005, a new points system was established, which is to assess the performance more objective.
